Why We Dig

Archaeology, Ludlow, and the Public

From its inception, the Colorado Coalfield War Archaeology Project was committed to developing a serious and focused public outreach component. We hoped we could go beyond the public lecture and other traditional forms of information sharing—important though these outlets are—to involving the public actively in our work and to a continuing conversation about its relevance to local and wider communities. We were fortunate to have archaeology as a medium to engage the public in a dialogue about Ludlow, labor wars, and class struggle. Archaeology is popular at many levels of society, as evidenced by the number of local amateur archaeological societies throughout the country and the frequency of archaeological programs on such television channels as the Discovery Channel, the History Channel, and others. In this chapter we first present the major messages we tried to convey to the public. Second, we examine the philosophies that underpinned our attempts to use the project as a means of public consciousness raising about the Colorado Coalfield War and the nature of archaeological knowledge production.
